Just at this moment, Grace came in, stood beside them and said, ‘Isn’t he clever?’ in a jocular manner.

Jagan could not answer her immediately, his mind was too full of confusion and questions. He felt hemmed in: the room has lost its original appearance and looked like an office in a foreign country. What was Mali trying to do? What was his own part in all this activity? What was going to be the nature of his involvement? He said with some trepidation, ‘Grace, do you know that our ancestors never even wrote the epics? They composed the epics and recited them, and the great books lived thus from generation to generation, by the breath of people...’
